If the agency believes, in its best scientific judgment, that implementing its preferred alternative would prevent having to do major follow-up work, then that sounds like the prudent course to take. However, if there's an option that would give more certainty of that, I think it would be a better choice even if it cost more money up front -- it pays dividends to do it right the first time.

Also, I think it would be informative if the EPA would describe the role it played in the proposal to build the search-and-rescue building where it was located (i.e. what input it gave, etc.).
